Lakes, forests and scenic waterways highlight a Magic Circle auto tour of northwestern Pennsylvania, starting in Titusville, where the first successful oil well was drilled by "Colonel" Edwin L. Drake a hundred years ago.

All traces are gone of the roaring oil boom towns that made the Wild West of fact and fable pale by comparison; each boasted plush hotels, saloons and false-front stores that served speculators, drillers, gamblers, painted ladies, businessmen.

After a visit to the state's Drake Well Memorial Park and Museum, the route south includes Pithole city, the ghost of a once rowdy metropolis; thriving Oil City, site of the nation's oldest well in continuous operation; Cook Forest, whose primeval grandeur includes a magnificent stand of white pine; Allegheny River Valley, its steep hills covered with fern, hemlock, rhododendron and mountain laurel, the state flower; and Warren, with its fine homes and impressive Civil War monument.

Curving west, there is the state fish hatchery at Corry; Fyntatuning Reservoir, a migratory waterfowl refuge; Conneaut Lake, a water playground; and Meadville, with a rare Colonial charm like that of a protected New England town, whose pride is Allegheny College, one of the oldest and most respected co-educational liberal arts institutions in the country.

THREATS TO UNCONFINED DOGS

By Bob Bartos
Manager, Friskies Research Kennels

The dog accustomed to being confined, either the country fellow who's been tied or penned or the city fellow off on a summer vacation, can get into all kinds of difficulties if given sudden freedom.

There are squirrels and rabbits to chase. Since both these play host to dog tapeworm larvae (an intermediate form of the dog tapeworm) your dog is apt to become infested with tapeworm should he catch and eat his quarry.

Rabbits, in addition to tapeworm larvae, are subject to the dread disease, tularemia, or rabbit fever, so the gentle little rabbit presents a definite threat to the health of your pet.

Deer chasing is another sport that trailing dog's like to indulge in. The musk gland in a deer has a particularly strong and tempting odor and a dog may follow its scent for miles until he is clear out of the county and lost. What's more, game wardens are usually permitted to shoot deer-chasing dogs on sight.

Your dog can run into a skunk and get sprayed. While this isn't serious, it does make him unwelcome in polite company, which naturally hurts his feelings.

Far more serious as well as painful is an encounter with a porcupine.

Then, there is always the lure of the garbage pail or unprotected dump where a dog can gorge to his heart's content. The aftermath of such feasting is, at best, a bad intestinal upset.

Poison put out for rats and other varmints and certain insecticide sprays are other potential dangers.

Still another hazard, probably the greatest of all to the free-running dog, is the automobile. So if you value not just the health of your pet, but perhaps his very life, don't favor him with unrestricted freedom in the country.

Feeding Tip: If you must give your dog between-meal snacks, make it prepared top quality dog food such as Friskies cubes.
