Ocelot Too Playful, Bites Hand As He Snatches At Furred Boot

by Dorothy Anderson
 Kathy Jones and Gail Kessler, Shavertown are close friends. The two fifteen year old girls are frequently together and a week ago Saturday, decided to go ice skating. Kathy called for Gail, wearing a pair of fur lined boots. The Kesslers' pet ocelot was romping about the downstairs on his daily release from his large basement pen. He had often played with Kathy. Ocelots love articles made of fur. He grabbed the soft top of Kathy's boot. Kathy pushed him away. He snatched at it several times with Kathy restraining him. On his next try to gain the coveted article, he nipped her right hand. Both Gail and Mrs. Kessler came to her assistance and the ocelot snapped at them. Mrs. Kessler immediately rushed Kathy to Dr. Gallagher who cauterized the puncture wound. The next day the hand began to swell and Dr. Bucan, the family physician ordered Kathy to General Hospital for antibiotics and continuous hot dressings to combat infection. She returned home on Sunday. Neither Gail nor Mrs. Kessler had ill effects from their bites. Mrs. Kessler says that the ocelot is normally a very lovable pet, but claims all rubber and fur articles for his own playthings.

ENGINEERS REINFORCE IT At Independence Hall Liberty Bell Is A Star

The number on the fire alarm box is, appropriately, 1776. This particular alarm rates an automatic four-alarm response from Philadelphia firemen. It would bring them streaking to historic Independence Hall which houses, among other national treasures, the great cracked Liberty Bell. Resting uncovered on the first floor of the building, the bell would be one of the first objects to be saved in the event of fire. Its pedestal is equipped with wheels for removal in an emergency. But even under normal conditions, the 2,080-pound colonial relic presents problems for the National Park Service which maintains the Hall as part of Independence National Historical Park. This year engineers undertook the delicate job of reinforcing the bell's support framework. They lowered the bell itself into a temporary mold, removed its supports and fitted sturdier side frames to a new steel platform. Into the time-eroded wooden yoke they inserted a strong steel beam capable of bearing twice the bell's weight. Touched affectionately by many generations of Americans, the Liberty Bell is not the original bell ordered from England in 1751 to hang in the Hall which was then the Pennsylvania State House. That bell cracked in its first test and had to be recast by two Philadelphia firms named Pass and Stow. They bungled the job, however, by putting in so much copper that the bell had a brassy tone. A third one was cast and finally raised into the steeple in 1753 to proclaim public events and announce legislative and court sessions. Historians think the Biblical injunction around the crown of the bell—"Proclaim liberty throughout all the land, unto all the inhabitants thereof"—probably referred to William Penn's Charter of Privileges. But it was highly apt to a bell that would lead defiance of British taxes and hail the Boston Tea Party and the signing of the Declaration of Independence. With the Revolution underway, the Liberty Bell took its place in the new nation's history. In 1777, with the British moving on Philadelphia, it was taken down and whisked away to Allentown for safekeeping. But it was returned the next year to ring out the successive victories by Washington's troops and finally brought an end to the war at Yorktown. The bell's sonorous notes in the years that followed did not always mark happy occasions. It tolled in mourning for the deaths of Washington, Jefferson, Adams and other giants of the Revolution. By tradition, it cracked in 1835 while tolling for the death of Chief Justice John Marshall. Today's visitors to Independence Hall invariably touch that crack and for this reason it has stood uncovered since 1917, a beloved symbol of the birth of a nation.

Mail Carrier Injured
 Jack Brown, a member of the Kingston Township mail carriers crew slipped on the ice on Friday and injured his head. Authorization from the Wilkes-Barre Post Office was needed before the poor man could be given medical attention and this was not obtained for several hours. What would happen to an employee who suffered a heart attack or more serious injury?

Petition Submitted
 The name of Fred Eck has been submitted to the Luzerne County Court for appointment as auditor of Kingston Township to replace Thomas Jenkins, who retired from the post. Fred, well versed in financial matters, will do an excellent job in this capacity.
