Penns Woods Notebook

You know it is interesting to take hikes into the woods and visit with other nature's wild animals and birds. I had the pleasure recently of going on a hike to visit a beaver dam. The dam is located up in the mountains of a place called Nordmont, Pennsylvania in Lycoming County, just about a one and a half hour ride from Dallas. The beaver is an interesting animal to study.

Men were not the first builders of dams. Beavers built dams long before men did. They are very clever engineers.

Beavers build their homes in ponds, making dams to hold back the water. There may be as many as 25 or 30 beaver homes in one pond formed by a beaver dam.

Making a beaver colony a success is the way that they work together to build their dams. Together they pile up logs and twigs, weighing them down with stones, and fastening them in place with mud. They then pat the mud into the cracks with their noses and feet, working on a dam until it is so solid and high that very little water can get through it or over it.

Their homes look like big piles of branches out in a pond. It is really a one room house with doors in the floor. Beavers must swim down into the water to get in or out of their residence. To get the necessary materials the beavers cut down trees. They belong to a group of gnawing mammals, or rodents, using the bark for food. They store logs and branches in the water near their homes, using stones on the branches to hold them down.

Poplar trees make the best food for beavers. To cut down a tree a beaver gnaws around and around it. He works until a deep ring is cut around the tree. When the tree shivers, the beaver slaps the ground with its tail. The slap warns the others that the tree is about to fall. Then down it comes. After it has fallen many beavers work together cutting it into pieces.

They have four long sharp teeth that are like chisels. Their front feet are small and unwebbed, hind feet are large and webbed. A beaver is dark brown above, pale chocolate below, with a broad flat and scaly tail, from 10 to 15 inches long. Total length is about 42 inches and average weight 40 to 50 pounds.

Some beavers in the pond may live by themselves in homes in the bank instead of in a log house, The homes in the bank are long tunnels. During the winter beavers stay in their homes most of the time, leaving only to get food.

They have beautiful fur. To get their fur we have killed far too many beavers for our own good. While they are building dams to help themselves, they are helping us, too. The dams hold back water, prevent floods, and keep our land from being washed away. The soil they save for us is much more valuable, and worth more than the fur.

Accompanying me to the beaver dam at Nordmont was Mr. Morris King, Al Pace and Skip Shaver. If you have any questions that you would like answered in this paper on wildlife or conservation send a post card with your name and address along with your questions to Penns Woods Notebook, Box

Corn Surplus Lower

The U. S. Department of Agriculture's quarterly report show a reduction in surplus of corn. On July 1, stocks were reported at 2,118,498,000 bushels, the lowest since 1958.

The combined total of all feed grains was 11 percent lower this year than last.

The reversal of the feed grain build up results from better balance between grain products and consumption reports D. Richard Wemmer, State Executive Director of the Penna. Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service.
