LAST EXCURSION

We couldn't afford the time, but Sunday afternoon we decided to have our first and last family outing for the season.

Our destination was the New Milford Folk Festival, approximately 60 miles distant in lovely country, not as picturesque as that along the trail of Wyalusing Rocks but nevertheless refreshing and peaceful. The route turned right at Tunkhannock, went through Nicholson and Hop Bottom. We took route 6 on the way home.

First neighbor we met was Myron Baker, Lehman. We asked if he was lending his dynamic talents to the local auction, but he chuckled and said he had brought the family on an outing and was picking up ideas for the Rotary Fair in October.

The balloon ascension had just been made and the rattlesnake milking also completed but there were many interesting hobbies and crafts on display and it was worth the time. Details appear elsewhere in the paper.

Following our picnic supper, we started back to the festival grounds, and discovered a flat tire. Freddie's lug wrench wouldn't fit, it was growing dark and Susie and I urged stopping a motorist. It is hard to say why men object to asking for aid, but finally our reasoning won out and the second traveler slid to a sudden halt. His lug wrench fit and in the descending darkness, we made the acquaintance of a nice family from New Milford suburbs. Our rescuer was on his way home from Rochester with his wife and daughter and a brand new kitten. He had suffered a heart attack several months previously, and said he was glad to give assistance as he himself might need help some time.

UNFINISHED STORY

In the story of Charles Harris last week, several items were deleted causing anguish on the part of Joan Brobst, whom we all know wouldn't harm a chick or child.

I had mentioned that the boys had waited until Mr. Cleasby passed on his way toward Dallas, that the boys standing along the Druid Hills side of the road were below the rise which impaired proper vision. This, however, did not appear in print.

[We are all praying for Charles' recovery and this should be the main concern, after all.
