Menopause is accomplished and accompanied by changes in the glandular functions of the body. These changes are sometimes evidenced by a tendency to blush with little or no provocation—"hot flashes," when it seems that a sudden wave of heat momentarily passes through the head, neck or body. Less often, there may be attacks, usually quite short in duration, of dizziness or "giddiness."

What Is Menopause

Menopause, which usually occurs between the 40th and 50th years, (though it can be ten years earlier or later in extreme cases) is merely a landmark in the termination of that period of a woman's life when procreation is possible. With menopause the menstrual cycle ceases and the inconveniences of menstruation comes to an end.

Therefore, the best counsel to be given a woman approaching this period of change in her life, or those already in the menopause, is to see that good general health is maintained.

Often "impediments" to nerve transmission of vital energy called "subluxations," cause a diminished or abnormal flow of nerve energy to reach certain affected muscles, glands, cells and tissues. This reduces the normal activity of the organs concerned and disturbs body metabolism.
