Rare Opportunity For Students Of Spanish

Some lucky person is going to be tutored by a woman who has all sorts of degrees from the University of Havana. Professor Marie Casals, who teaches Spanish at College Misericordia, will have time to take a few private pupils, partly as a means of improving her own English.

Dr. Casals, here in the United States on a two-year teaching arrangement, arrived here with a book knowledge of English, but no practical application. Rooming in the home of Lillian Kuehn on Church Street, she is fast learning from her hostess how to pronounce everyday English. When she came to Dallas at the beginning of the school year by taxi from Wilkes-Barre, she could write beautiful English, but pronunciation was beyond her.

Mrs. Kuehn says: "When we bog down in our communication system, we write notes to each other."

Dr. Casals is niece of the famous cellist Casals. Her brother is also in this country on a two-year teaching stint in Connecticut.
