BRACHIAL NEURITIS

Brachial neuritis is an inflammation of the large nerve plexus which emits from the spine at the base of the neck and runs down the arm to the finger tips. The inflammation is usually the result of a pressure or pinching of the nerve at its point of emission by a misaligned vertebra. Normal movement of the head and neck will in this case, produce friction at the point of pressure and thus inflame the nerve root.

The pain involved in this condition is acutely severe, very similar to that experienced in sciatica, which is actually the same condition but an inflammation of the sciatic nerve rather than the brachial.

In brachial neuritis the pain runs across the shoulder, down the arm and possibly out into the fingertips. It may start as a numbness in the arm and fingertips. Even the strongest medication will only give a short period of relief of the severe pain.

The cause of the pressure or pinching of the nerve must be found and removed before the nerve will be allowed to heal and return to a healthy state.

Chiropractic is unmistakably the most efficient means of combating brachial neuritis. Chiropractic being the science which deals primarily with the nerves and nervous system offers the most logical, healthful and efficient means of controlling and eliminating the cause of this painful condition.

So with this first symptom of brachial neuritis see your chiropractor and have your spine checked at regular intervals to prevent such conditions.
