Penn's Woods Girl Scouts Learn New Words In Idaho

Our teenagers who are attending the 1965 Girl Scout Senior Roundup in Farragut, Idaho, did not pack dictionaries in their duffel bags, but they're sure to astound their families with some new words they'll sprinkle liberally throughout letters home.

If they mention Potlatch, they could be talking about the ceremonial giving of gifts by Indians of the Northwest. At the Roundup, however, potlatch will be dramatized by the exchange of handmade tokens symbolic of their home regions.

A visit to the Rendezvous is actually a walk back into yesterday. Formerly a central meeting place for Indians, trappers and traders in Idaho's early days, at Roundup it will be a huge central area featuring exhibits and demonstrations depicting the early years of the Northwest. An authentic Indian village, Appaloosa horses, Basque Dancers, displays of frontier life, tree topping, sheep-shearing, fur trapping will vie for the attention of campers and visitors.

If the girls decide to follow one of the six hiking trails marked out on the 5,000 acre site, they're likely to come upon a Wickiup or Shebang. In early days these were crude huts or cabins built as resting places on the trail for Indians, pack trains and road agents. For Roundup purposes, they will serve as wilderness "information booths" at the beginning of the trails to be trekked by the Girl Scouts.

When the girls say they've seen the Nez Perce dance, they've seen one of the local Indian tribes perform traditional dances. The tribal name is French for "pierced nose" because members wore ornaments in their noses.

The Nez Perce Indians will also put the Appaloosa through their paces. Even girls from Texas may not have heard about this breed of spotted horse which was saved from extinction by the animal-wise Nez Perce.
