STRANGE DOG TRAITS By Bob Bartos, Manager Friskies Pet Foods Research Center

There are some traits common to all dogs, that are not what you might expect of a supposedly civilized pet. Yet for each of the traits there's justifiable explanation which can be traced back to the days when dogs were

Take for example the unpleasant habit of rolling de-lightedly in anything dead. The wild dog did this out of necessity to camouflage his own odor by covering it up with one that was stronger and non-doggy. He could thus hunt his prey without being detected.

Then there's the habit of burying bones. The wild dog, when unable to eat what he killed at a single session, wisely hid the leftovers for day when hunting was lean.

fore finally lying down goes back to the need to trample down the grass to make a bed and to check the resting spot for any alien residents.

Then there's the custom of tucking his tail between his legs when scared. The wild dog was not only a hunter, he was also the hunted, and if his tail was down instead of up when being pursued it was not such an easily grabbed target.

While not all dogs bolt down their food as if it's their last meal, many still do. In all likelihood this is because their ancestors often did not have a square meal for a number of days. An-other possibility is that his habit may stem from an in-herited fear that some other bigger and stronger animal would come and take it.
