Tips For Battle Against Colds

If you've been applying the adage "feed a cold and starve a fever" to your colds and other minor winter ailments, forget it.

It's sometimes better, in fact, to do the opposite, say medical specialists at Aetna Life & Casualty, one of the nation's largest health insurance writers.

When you have a cold and aren't really hungry, they advise, don't eat excessively; your condition is particularly conducive to stomach upset. And don't be afraid of taking extra nourishment when you have burned by higher body temperatures.

Your best bet is to eat well-balanced meals at all times. That will help you maintain the good general health that gives you an edge in combating the common cold, a malady that plagues some 20 million Americans on any given winter day.

In a public service pamphlet titled "Cold Facts About the Common Cold," the insurance company doctors offer these additional tips to help prevent colds and minimize their discomfort when they do strike:

1. To reduce chances of getting a cold, steer clear of cold sufferers and don't use their towels, drinking glasses, or eating utensils. Avoid cold drafts, wet feet, and fatigue.
2. Practice good personal hygiene. Always wash your hands before preparing or eating food.
3. Maintain sufficient humidity in your home and, if possible, in your office, especially during the winter heating season. A dry nose and throat contributes to the possibility of infection.
4. If a cold strikes, don't experiment with pills and medicines remaining from previous illnesses or with remedies recommended by friends. Many more serious illnesses will imitate the early symptoms of a cold. All colds are not alike and what's right for one may not be for another.

5. Blot, don't blow your nose. Blowing the nose may force infection into the sinuses, prolonging your cold. Use disposable tissues to blot excess mucus as necessary.

6. Get extra bed rest and keep comfortably warm.

7. If cold symptoms persist longer than a few days, or if a fever develops, call a doctor.
