Explaining About God
On TV there was an interview with a Lutheran minister, a former student of the late Dieterich Bonhoeffer. He was to explain the terrible phrase, "God is dead." His explanation was good, a meaning I had assumed was meant. Many have held erroneous ideas about God and the aim of some theologians is to change those ideas, by coarsely announcing, "God is dead." Meaning, that kind of God.
My quarrel is not with the explanation but with the phrasing. Along with many others my concept of God has changed radically through the years. The big picture Bible available in my childhood showed God as a venerable, long-bearded man holding a yardstick. He lay on his stomach on a low-hanging cloud above Noah, showing him how to build the ark. When that image of God faded from my mind it never occurred to me to say, "God is dead." My present idea of God came not from theories in a book but out of first-hand experience and "confrontation" with God.
The theologians did not have to blast out such a terrible phrase, "God is dead." Not that people will necessarily lose faith in God but they will lose faith in the integrity of teachers of theology whose business it is to lead us into all truth about God. Let them indeed clarify notions about God, lead us to such personal alignment with God as can be tested in their everyday experience.

EASTER MORN
I
In the stillness of the morning, Oh,
Before the sun had lit the sky;
I saw a crowd begin to grow,
And stopped to seek the reason why.
II
"Why do you gather here today?"
I asked the nearest one at hand,
And, though he didn't look my way,
He tried to make me understand.
III
He raised his hand into the air;
And pointed to the eastern rim;
And said, with voice so soft and fair:
"We come, my son, to worship Him!"
IV
And, there, outlined against the sky,
I saw three crosses standing still;
And then no longer wondered why
The crowd had gathered on the hill.
V
On bended knee, with head now bowed,
I felt a strangeness in me born;
And, with the gentle, praying, crowd
Welcomed in the Easter Morn!
—Al Bellas

Explaining About God
On TV there was an interview with a Lutheran minister, a former student of the late Dieterich Bonhoeffer. He was to explain the terrible phrase, "God is dead." His explanation was good, a meaning I had assumed was meant. Many have held erroneous ideas about God and the aim of some theologians is to change those ideas, by coarsely announcing, "God is dead." Meaning, that kind of God.
My quarrel is not with the explanation but with the phrasing. Along with many others my concept of God has changed radically through the years. The big picture Bible available in my childhood showed God as a venerable, long-bearded man holding a yardstick. He lay on his stomach on a low-hanging cloud above Noah, showing him how to build the ark. When that image of God faded from my mind it never occurred to me to say, "God is dead." My present idea of God came not from theories in a book but out of first-hand experience and "confrontation" with God.
The theologians did not have to blast out such a terrible phrase, "God is dead." Not that people will necessarily lose faith in God but they will lose faith in the integrity of teachers of theology whose business it is to lead us into all truth about God. Let them indeed clarify notions about God, lead us to such personal alignment with God as can be tested in their everyday experience.
