reading confab here

Returning to College Misericordia, her alma mater, as a leader in the 10th annual reading-education conference April 18 and 19, will be Sister Maureen Gaffney, RSM. Along with Sister Monica Marie Reichmuth, RSM, she will take part in a demonstration in special education, "The Neurologically Impaired Child—Characteristics and Education." Both nuns teach at the St. Maurice Day School in Pottomac, Md.

audience shocked by not being shocked

The audience at Dallas Senior High School Thursday night simmered uneasily as Dr. Steven Homel introduced his topic, "Sex and Narcotics."

One woman expressed it in an undertone, "I'm afraid I'll hear something I don't want to hear. Maybe I shouldn't have come."

A neighbor suggested, "Well, what did you come for? Nothing is keeping you here, you can always get up and leave."

Members of the Rotary, Kiwanis, and Lions service clubs accepted an invitation to "come on down front and fill the empty seats," filing in sheepishly to take their places, an assemblage of solid citizens, leading clerics, and businessmen.

Dr. Homel started to speak, employing techniques common to group therapy work, talking to his listeners and persuading them to talk back.

He brushed off the narcotics angle with a few deft strokes, and concentrated on sex, the bait which had drawn a capacity crowd.

As Dr. Robert Mellman, superintendent of Dallas schools, expressed it later, "They came to be shocked, expected to be shocked and were disappointed when they weren't shocked. They were anticipating blue prints."

How to tell ALL? Dr. Homel gathered the audience into the fold with an adroit approach, operating, not from the rostrum, but from the floor, confronting people with the microphone, and hypnotizing their minds and posing questions.

With the expertise of an old hand at the game of guiding an audience, he got just exactly what he wanted, without forcing an issue.

"Now, you are in the sixth grade at school. Think of the questions that you could have asked in the sixth grade. John, you're a sixth grader."

"And now, you're in kindergarten. You're asking where babies come from. How do they get there? You've been told a lot of things. Do you believe them? What does your mother tell you?"

"And now you're big boys and girls. You want to know what's wrong with having sex relations."

What developed, through dialogue with the audience, was that children are by nature imitative; that the atmosphere of the home is all important for setting the stage for acceptable human relations; that with expanding horizons and greater contact with the larger world as distinguished from the secure home nest, children begin asking themselves, "What am I?"

Sex education, Dr. Homel said, means many things to many people. To some, it is family planning, instructing children in the meaning of life from the age of three up through adolescence, warning against venereal disease, against pregnancy, against taking advantage of another human being.

To some, it is four-letter words. To some, it is something to sweep under the rug. Don't look at it, and it will go away.

Many parents do not have the words, and many children cannot understand the words, listening with apparent interest, but with completely closed minds, so that the information rolls over them, and the tide recedes, leaving the sand as dry as it was before.

Puppy love? Does the puppy know he's a puppy? Never. He thinks he is completely adult, and he knows all the answers.

Smoking, reckless driving, drinking, are all symbols of a growing urge to become adult overnight, and indiscriminate sex is on the same loading platform.

People who used to deplore the double standard find that imperceptibly the standards for behavior in boys and girls are converging rapidly upon one single standard.

The drawback, physiologically speaking, is that the girl has a larger stake in indiscriminate intercourse than the boy does.

Dr. Homel pointed out that there are 350,000 teen-age pregnancies in the country each year. If the abortionist doesn't intervene, or there is no miscarriage, that adds up to 350,000 births.

What is abortion? What is miscarriage?

What is the chance for disease? What about penicillin? All children, Dr. Homel pointed out, have access to information.

If the information is not available in the home, if parents are tongue-tied and feel incapable of answering questions, the responsibility devolves upon the school or upon the church.

Children will find out what they need to know. If they do not find it through the usual channels, they will find it elsewhere.

"Sex, as sex, is simply a part of the entire gamut of human behavior, the wish to be one of the gang, the shrinking from being different and therefore labelled as a square.

To experiment with marijuana in the belief that it will give "reality," Dr. Homel explained, is a sheer fantasy, and the same applies to experimentation with sex.

Who am I? What can influence me? What can I do to control my emotions? Do I have to be like everybody else? Why? These are the questions.

High pressures take over in the adolescent years. One drops too much, and there goes the cork. It isn't the one added drop, it's the whole seething mass. Like drop-outs. Drop-outs don't occur suddenly in the tenth grade, the foundation for dropping out has been laid in the third grade.

Dr. Homel spent the following day at Dallas schools, speaking to grades in the auditorium all day, and the faculty after school dismissal.

Instruction to parents was, "Stay away." Instruction to preachers was, "Get lost. Sit in the back of the auditorium, and don't open your heads."

Director Earl Fritsges' comment was, "We've got to get this man back again."

Principal Thomas Jenkins summed it up: "Where's he been all these years? This is what we've been needing. I heard him down in Harrisburg, and I was sold solid three minutes after he started speaking. He's got the most common sense approach to human relations of anybody I've ever heard. He's talking about people and he's talking to people, and he gets through to people."

Mr. Smith's wife, Mildred, is president of the Pennsylvania ginners.

Dallas man returns from Washington

Don Smith, Country Club Road, Dallas, recently returned from Washington, D.C., where he met with federal and state legislators to discuss programs involving the engineering profession.

Mr. Smith, senior partner of Smith, Miller and Associates, Kingston, consulting engineers, serves as chairman of the National Society of Professional Engineers in the legislative and government affairs committee. He is past president of Pennsylvania Society of Engineers, and a past national director of the Society.

While in Washington, Mr. Smith was headquartered at the National Society of Professional Engineers Building, which he designed.

Locally, Mr. Smith designed the Dallas Junior High School, now in construction, Lake-Lehman High School, and renovations at Penn State's Wilkes-Barre campus, Hayfield House. Mr. Smith's wife, Mildred, is president of the Pennsylvania ginners.
