BOOK WORM

By CAROLYN KOLLS

Anne Moody grew up in rural Mississippi. Her parents were sharecroppers, working in the fields during the daylight hours, leaving Anne and her infant sister at home in the cabin under the resentful supervision of an eight year old uncle.

Anne Moody learned self-reliance early. The few cents and the bucket of clabber milk that she earned for sweeping a neighbor's house and porch helped to feed her family. Anne Moody was black, and she soon learned that it was this, and only this, that made her and her brothers sit upstairs at the Saturday movies, and made them unsuitable playmates for certain of their friends.

Anne Moody was both bright and beautiful. She was also introspective. At the encouragement of friends Anne Moody has written her own story, in the language in which it was lived. Coming of Age in Mississippi is one girl's experience of self-realization. It is neither an amalgam nor a simplification, but the reactions of a thoughtful girl to her environment, the good and the bad in it, the rewarding and the puzzling. To the reader Anne will always be a real person, sensitive and strong-willed. She is a good person to know.
