

windows important to design

by William Pahlmann

Window treatments are among the most important elements of any interior design scheme, but it does not follow that you absolutely have to have a fabric curtain. The goal of a window treatment is to control light, air and view, and curtains may not always be the most desirable solution.

Non-fabric window treatments may account for less maintenance and may solve problems which fabric cannot always accomplish, or you may simply like the new skinned-down, bare look instead of the immemorial curtains. Fabric curtaining imparts softness to a room and a good deal will depend on your own nature and the sort of interiors you like. Climate also has some influence on the matter. In very cold places the hard chic of uncurtained windows may not be inviting.

A friend of mine who is in the fabric business has no curtains in his large living room to compete with his fine collection of modern art. Any glaze from his river view is tempered with louvered shutters.

Many apartments along New York's East River have uncluttered vistas of river traffic, skyline excitement, rooftops with their chimney pots, and, if high enough, vast sweeps of real estate, good and bad. In the country I have left windows curtainless to get full benefit of the woods and bits of distance views. It is at night when darkness brings on a blackness that one might feel the need of some sort of protection. I prefer to do some special lighting of the trees, or a stretch of the garden, to overcome this somber feeling.

If you are tired of curtains or do not find them necessary, consider the following alternatives:

Shutters or Louvers. Shutters can be very flexible, providing ventilation and light and insuring privacy. If you have no view or look out on something ugly, shuttered windows may be a good solution. They are neat, tailored and attractive—look cool in hot climates. Shutters can be applied to arched or off-beat-shaped windows.

Lattice. Lattice can be effectively used to screen a whole window wall if the vista outside is not attractive. Lattice has an insouciant garden air that gives a fillip to dull, dark rooms. Lattice can be painted the wallcolor and requires virtually no maintenance.

Fretted Screens. Sections of Morish or Indian carved, or fretted screens can be fitted to windows and beautiful effects are achieved.

Roll Blinds. Roll blinds come in many materials, from low-cost stick blinds through Venetian blinds to extravagantly expensive handwoven blinds. They are satisfactory and can be spectacular, depending on what they are made of.

Pleated Parchment. Window treatments made of parchment, pleated like parchment lamp shades, can be installed on small, difficult windows, pulled back to admit light and air. Pleated paper or glazed fabrics can be used in the same manner.

Roman Shades. Roman shades, which are often made of fabric, can be made of other materials. These horizontally pleated shades are newer than Austrian shades.

Difficult windows which defy curtaining, such as the high clerestory, the steep dormer or the peaked-roof window, can be left uncurtained, since they usually do not have to insure privacy. Wall-size windows, which give on a fine view, do not have to be curtained, as long as privacy is not involved. I feel that these windows are always more attractive if they are broken up with mouldings instead of presenting one solid sheet of glass.

Kitchen and bathroom windows seem to me to lend themselves to blinds or shades rather than fabric curtaining. Steams and odors in these areas soon reduce fabric treatments to limpness.

A strike of Local 1824, Textile Workers Union of America, has been underway at Natona Mills since May 25 as a result of a contract dispute. Union members are picketing under terms of an injunction granted by Luzerne County Court July 31. No mass picketing or interruption of traffic into and out of the plant is allowed.

Mr. Graham said he is awaiting a counterproposal and is ready to sit down to talk, to try to identify problems and come up with solutions, as long as it's with a meaningful group of people. He said "We will do our utmost and keep our cool."

Tall arched, recessed windows in this country dining room are treated with wooden shutters instead of the conventional curtains, letting in light and air and blending handsomely with the Spanish architecture of the room.
