look for struvite in canned fish

Food inspectors of the Pennsylvania Department of Agriculture have been instructed to be on the lookout for a glasslike substance in certain canned seafood products.

The substance, called struvite, is a formation of potassium magnesium phosphate crystals. It is not poisonous, but can lacerate a person's tongue or mouth because of the sharp, pointed nature of the struvite crystals, which look like tiny shards of broken glass.

Glorio J. Patsy, chief of the Department's Division of Food Control, said the Department's inspectors have been told to examine fish products such as shrimp, kippered snacks and tuna, and embargo any lots found to contain struvite.

Mr. Patsy said the reason for the formation of struvite in canned fish is a mystery. He said struvite has been around for "a long time" and occasionally crops up.

According to Mr. Patsy, struvite dissolves in vinegar or acetic acid.

safety chains required for vehicles

Owners of travel trailers, tent campers and conversion camping units are now required by Pennsylvania law to use safety chains in towing these recreational vehicles.

This warning was issued by the Pennsylvania Recreational Vehicle and Camping Association, which notes that the new regulation has been effective since July 23.

Previously, safety chains were required only for units towed on the Pennsylvania Turnpike. The law affects any recreational vehicle being
