white-footed mice may come to call

Cooler fall weather may encourage white-footed mice to enter your house or hunting camp, cautions County Agent E. V. Chadwick.

This mouse is one of the most common mammals in Pennsylvania's forests. Whitefooted mice eat nuts, berries, seeds, insects and tender bark of growing trees. But, inside your hunting cabin they turn to fruit, crackers, stored cereals and other food crumbs. They will gnaw through cardboard and other packaging to reach stored foods.

Mouseproof your cabin. Make sure all doors are in good repair and tightly closed. A mouse can get in through a hole the size of a nickel.

Replace any broken windows or torn screens at ground level and shut all the cellar windows and doors. Usually mice won't gnaw their way in—they get inside through openings. And then usually come in at ground level; they seldom climb up to look for an opening.

The best control for white-footed mice is the snap-trap. Peanut butter or bits of bacon are effective baits, commercially prepared baits are not legally registered for white-footed mice.

Jefferson Airplane is a bring-down

by Carolyn Gass

Persons of all ages clad in maxi-coats, long skirts, blue jeans and more freaky attire flocked to the Kingston Armory last Wednesday night for a concert by the much-publicized Jefferson Airplane. By 7:30 the Armory was nearly filled to capacity—people and blankets covered the floor and balconies as everyone prepared for a groovy night.

First to perform was the American Asphalt, a local group whose selections did little to stem the rising tide of anticipation on which the audience was floating. Cynara, a rock group from N.Y., played next and their hard rock sound rated them a comparison to Santana.

Anticipation and doubt grew as each selection was completed. Where were they? Finally, finally around 11 p.m. the Jefferson Airplane zoomed in for a landing. The "Acid Rock... Stoned Audience" clapped and cheered—They were here at last!

Their repertoire included "White Rabbit" and "Somebody to Love," well-known hits from a day gone by. Unfortunately, the amplifiers were far too loud and though pregnant Grace Slick, elegant in a cranberry-colored empire midi dress, belted out her songs in full voice, the music melted together, "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing."

The real highlight of the show was a fabulous light show created by Glenn McKay. The lights flicked to the undulating rhythms of the music and provided a visual treat that was not equalled by the promise of past Jefferson Airplane recordings.

In bringing the Airplane to Wyoming Valley, the People's Production Inc. did their best; hopefully they'll continue in their efforts to bring name groups to this area.

While it is true that kissing may help spread some diseases, such as colds, the flu and the one that is known as the "kissing disease"—infectious mononucleosis—it is still a good thing to do. When one considers not kissing, the family doctor would recommend that his patient kiss and take the very slight risk of spreading germs. Denying a kiss as a sign of affection may be mentally harmful.

Said in another way, the kiss as an indication of love might even improve one's mental and emotional health and add to—rather than decrease—life expectancy.

commercial routes, he stayed awake day and night. Finally, after 78 days, the voyage was over. Incredibly, Robert Manry's most intense emotion was not one of relief but of disappointment. The dream of a lifetime was over; what was left but to return to Cleveland and the copy desk?

In an effort to re-live the journey—and pay the $2,000-plus expenses the trip had cost—Robert Manry chose instead to write a book and take to the lecture circuit. Tinkerbelle, the book, was a best-seller and Tinkerbelle, the boat, now rests in a Cleveland museum.

How is he a different person now that he's sailed the Atlantic? "I value human companionship more," Mr. Manry told The Post, "I used to pride myself on being very self-reliant, very independent. But having spent 78 days without companions, away from virtually all visual and auditory stimuli, I now realize just how important other human beings are."

The words "risk" and "danger" are not really as applicable to Tinkerbelle's voyage as most people believe, Mr. Manry modestly insists. The craft was a sturdy one and, inch for inch, stronger than much larger vessels. His wife, in fact, had said she would worry less about him aboard Tinkerbelle in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean than she would if he were commuting back and forth to work in Cleveland's rush-hour traffic. Her view proved tragically prophetic; she was killed a year and a half ago in a traffic accident.

Mr. Manry is at work now on a book tentatively titled "The Voyage of the Curlew," which details a voyage down the Mississippi River which he and his family took two years ago. His children's mutinies during that trip will form an important segment of the book, he promises, and will be indexed under "The Generation Gap."

It is Robert Manry's gift that he can make his thrilling exploits come alive for other people; he can persuade his listeners that they, too, could sail a small boat single-handed across the Atlantic... if only they could find the time.
