Don't waste your energy.

Or, how to keep your heating costs from going through the roof. And the walls. And the doors and windows.

UGI Corporation wants you to be warm this winter. And save on heating costs, too.

In light of the current, nation-wide energy shortage, it's as important as ever to conserve energy. And the fact is, it takes twice as much fuel to heat an uninsulated house as an insulated one—due to heat loss.

No matter how well, or how poorly, your house may be insulated, chances are you can save on heating costs—and conserve precious energy, too.

Here's how: Start in the attic.

In an uninsulated house, 33% of heat loss goes through the roof.

Make sure your attic is well insulated. Choose insulation by its "R" value. The higher the "R" value, the greater its insulating ability. Seal openings from the heated spaces below, but keep outdoor air vents open in the winter to prevent condensation in the insulation and other building materials.

Inspect the whole house.

Another 33% of heat loss in an uninsulated house goes through walls, ceilings, and floors.

Go through the house and make notes of all uninsulated areas you find. If you have a room over a garage, make sure there's insulation beneath the floor.

Insulation can pay for itself in reduced heating costs.

Put up storm doors and windows.

Doors and windows account for 24% of heat loss in an insulated house.

Installing storm doors and windows, or insulating glass, can cut this heat loss in half. You can also reduce heat loss by drawing shades or draperies at night, and on cold days when the sun isn't shining.

Seal up cracks.

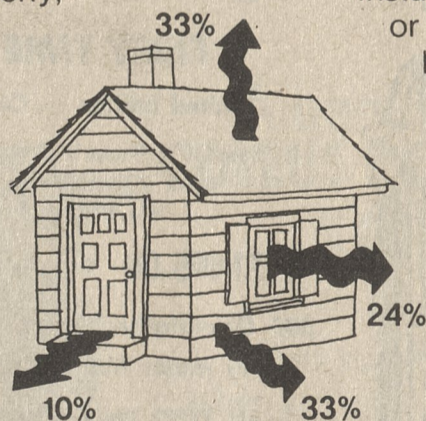

In an uninsulated house, openings and cracks between door and window frames cause heat loss, too.

Seal openings under doors and windows with metal or felt strip, and close up cracks between door and window frames with ready-made rope putty. You may reduce your heating costs by up to 30%.

And while you're at it, be sure to replace any cracked window panes where heat might escape.

Whether you can cut down on heat loss by 80%, or by 50%, or by 20%, depends, of course, on your house—and you.

But please do your bit. You'll save on heating costs, and you'll conserve precious energy, too.

Here's the pattern of heat loss in an uninsulated house.

Don't waste your energy.
