STATE CAPITOL ROUNDUP Republicans control both houses

For the first time in 13 vears, the Republican party will be in control of both houses of the General Assembly at the start of a new legislative session in January. When the vote count was complete on election night, Republicans held a 103-100 majority in the House of Representatives and had picked up three seats in the Senate for a 25-25 tie. That deadlock can be broken by Lt. Gov. William Scranton, whose deciding vote on organizational and procedural matters will allow the GOP to direct the flow of legislation. Control of the Senate will be at stake again early next year when a special election is held to fill the unexpired term of Sen. Budd Dwyer (R-Crawford), who must resign his seat after winning the race for state treasurer. The situation is further complicated by the case of Sen. Vincent Fumo, a Philadelphia Democrat who won reelection despite being convicted last month of payroll-padding. Should Fumo be outsted from the Senate or resign, still another special election would be necessary.
