They Know the Newspaper Business

It is truly surprising to realize just how sophisticated youngsters are about the world of newspapers.

The original intent was to visit Mrs. Tripp's fifth grade language arts class and explain the workings of a newspaper. However, this reporter quickly found out the students knew quite a bit about the ingredients necessary for good journalism already. And, they had very definite ideas about what they liked in the print media.

A glimpse at the premier edition of the Intermediate Voice, a student newspaper which resulted from their study of the topic, proved they had grasped the idea quite well.

The class, under the supervision of Carole Connelly, a student teacher from College

Misericordia, studied a unit on "the newspaper." To put their learning to practical use, they composed the Intermediate Voice. The paper included a well-rounded variety of news stories and features with emphasis on national, local, school and sports news. The original writing was combined with artwork and editorial comments, games, and entertainment listings. The end result was informative, newsy and fun, with something for everyone, as a true newspaper ought to be.

It was refreshing to see such enthusiasm for the print media among the youngsters. Hopefully this will remain with a few as they grow older. Perhaps a future Dallas Post editor was among the group.
