

Adult Learning Service meets educational demand

Millions of Americans need new knowledge and skills to succeed in today's competitive job market. PBS' Adult Learning Service is helping to meet these critical educational demands.

This season the PBS Adult Learning Service is providing college-level television courses to the local partnerships of public TV 44 and the University of Scranton and Luzerne County Community College. These courses offer viewers with a variety of needs and interests a special change to go to college, without leaving their homes or offices. Each for-credit course is a comprehensive learning system, where the student uses both video and print units under faculty supervision. Premiering this season is "The New Literacy: An Introduction to Computers," the first course to emerge from the prestigious Annenberg-CPB Project. The project is a multi-million-dollar effort to develop new, quality college-level materials using communications technologies.

"The new Literacy" 26-part series covers introductory computer concepts, data flow, applications, programming, enhancing system capabilities. "The Business of Management" is specially designed for the person who has decided upon a career in business, government or education management but has not had formal training. The 26-part series offers essential skills in organizing, staffing, decision-making and motivating.
