Children must have positive self-image

In order to lead happy and productive lives, children need to develop a positive self-image, the feeling that "I am somebody." Two articles in the March issue of PTA Today, the National PTA's magazine, offer suggestions for how parents can help their children develop self-esteem.

According to Thomas Coleman, a Fellow of the American Academy of Pediatrics, and author of the first article, the following ideas can help foster self-esteem in children:

—Level with children. Don't talk down to a young person; instead, put yourself at eye level with a child. It can often minimize a problem, as well as make the child feel equal.

—Let children make decisions. For example, early participation in health care decisions such as, "Do you want liquid medicine or tablets?" lessens a child's feeling of powerlessness, and can foster an intelligent consumer attitude in children.

—Value rules. The purpose of rules is to help people get along with each other and in turn, feel good about themselves. The best rules are written during calm times with the participation of the child.

—Show child you understand. Share your childhood memories with your child.
