Have a phobia? Now, there's help

Most of the 22 million Americans who suffer from phobias do so needlessly because they don't know that quick and reliable treatment is available. Reader's Digest reports in its August issue.

A person can have a phobia about virtually anything: flying, driving, closed spaces, open spaces, dogs, bridges, darkness, crowds, fire, death, strangers or snakes. While fears and anxieties grip everyone periodically, a phobic generates uncontrollable panic when there is no real danger.

Left untreated, victims become prisoners of their fears and avoid situations that might provoke panic. Therapists try to break this stranglehold by encouraging their patients to face their fears in real-life situations.

For more information in finding help on treatment for phobias, send a self-addressed, stamped envelope to the Phobia Society of America, 6191 Executive Blvd., Rockville, Md. 20852.
