Drinking and driving is problem

Drinking and driving is becoming an increasingly serious problem for teenagers, according to the Health Education Department at The Pennsylvania State University. Teenagers who drive after drinking are more likely than other age populations to crash, with less alcohol in the system, and to have passengers killed.

Teenagers are involved in alcohol-related traffic fatalities more than any other age group. In one state 43 percent of the drinking drivers killed were 16 to 24 years old, but only 24 percent of the state's drivers were in that age group. Between 1960 and 1973, arrests for driving under the influence of alcohol increased by more than 400 percent for people under 18.

According to one national survey of junior and senior high school students, teenage drinking increased with each grade level until 93 percent of twelfth grade boys and 87 percent of twelfth grade girls had experience with alcohol.

Driving a car is an extremely important aspect of the teenage social structure, and the driver's license is frequently viewed as passage into the adult world and experiences. Through the automobile, the teenager can experience power and autonomy seldom found in other areas of his or her life.

Most eligible teenagers will drive and most will be faced at times with situations involving drinking and driving. What we have is a population of teenagers who are not only inexperienced at drinking, but also inexperienced at driving.

Society faces a serious challenge to lower this high rate of teenage drinking and driving. Alcohol highway safety should be a part of a general health education. It should be considered a life-style issue. Areas to be discussed should include alcohol and the American life-style, alcohol and its effect on the body, as well as effects of alcohol on human behavior and emotions.
