Japan to boost autos

By E. FEULNER

Though President Ronald Reagan has called for an end to "voluntary" restraint agreement limiting Japanese auto imports, don't expect a massive influx of inexpensive Japanese cars.

The Japanese already have announced they will boost auto exports to the U.S. by approximately 25 percent. But this will only bring the total to 2.3 million units. And with President Reagan expressing displeasure with the increase, the Japa-nese are doubtful to go higher.

With the U.S.-Japan trade deficit running at a record pace - $36 billion in 1984 - the Japanese are aware of the protectionist fever spreading like a pox on Capitol Hill. So agreement or not.

there will be no dramatic increase in the number of Toyotas. Hondas and Nissans reaching our shores and those that do more often than not will be pricey top-ofthe-line machines.

Overreacting to the end of the quotas, as he is wont to do, Chrysler Chairman Lee Iacocca, the guru of economic flapdoodle, has threatened to pick up his tax-subsidized marbles and leave the game. If the U.S. government won't continue to keep the Japanese bullies out of Chrysler's back yard, Iacocca says, he will build Chrysler's new line of "Liberty" cars overseas. This confirms what some people have been whispering for years: that Iacocca has been using profits Chrysler reaped while the quotas were in effect

not to make Chrysler

more competitive, but to polish its image and spread the gospel according to Iacocca. The so-called "voluntary restraint agreement," which expired at the end of March, dates back to Under the old agreement, from 1981 through 1983 the Japanese were allowed to ship 1.68 million cars annually to the U.S. Last year the ceiling rose modestly to 1.85 million.

By restricting the number of imported cars, Washington made it possible for U.S. companies to raise prices without fear of losing business to less-expensive competitors. That's exactly what hap-pened. Wharton Econometrics calculates that the average cost for a new U.S. made car rose $2,600 during the life of the restric-
