Rotary hears speaker

Paul Brown, Manager of Special Projects at Proctor and Gamble's huge Mehoopany Plant, recently addressed Dallas Rotary Club on some of the current capital spending at the Plant. Most of his talk focused on the huge gas turbine which provides the hot air used in the papermaking process while generating most of the electric power required at the facility. There are even periods of the year when the generating capability exceeds the demand and power is fed back to the Utility. In the accompanying photograph Paul Brown, center, is being introduced to the club by Hugh Woodard, left and Don Lockhart, right, President of Dallas Rotary Club.

Center's programs help educate children

Children are very special, yet very vulnerable. Recognizing this, the Victims Resource Center took steps to enable children to protect themselves from unwanted touches, including sexual misuse. Educational programs, recognized on professional as well as lay levels, were developed at the Center. The programs were recognized by the Economic Development Council and given the Pocono Northeast Community Award, and are distributed statewide as a model for programming throughout Pennsylvania.

The VRC's "Child Safety Program" enables children to become assertive when dealing with those who would attempt to touch a child in a way that is harmful. It's now well documented that teaching a child to stay away from strangers is not sufficient to protect them from sexual abuse. It is now fact that children are victimized most frequently by family, relative or friend. Programs aid children in learning ways to say "No" even to an adult, developing support lines in areas besides family, such as a teacher, school nurse, etc. and in recognizing the need to "tell." "No" - "Go" - "Tell" can be the three most important words in a child vocabulary.

The educational programs, funded by Luzerne County Children and Youth comprise a K-6 Child Safety

Program that focuses on concepts of good touch-bad touch, assertiveness and the identification of support systems. In Jr. High, the programs expand on the touch concept and discuss acquaintance rape. The high school program focuses on non-stranger rape-abuse and child safety.

Companion programs that expand on these issues for parents and those who work with children now available at the VRC. A "Touch Continuum Program" that enables adults to identify and utilize acceptable touches with children will soon be offered by the VRC.

The Center, a United Way Agency, recognizes the fact that Child Sexual Abuse is on the rise. In Luzerne County, the Center saw a four percent increase in Child Sexual Abuse last year. The VRC worked with 485 clients during fiscal year 1984-85, 59 percent of these clients were under 18 years of age.

During the 1984-85 year VRC's specially trained speakers presented over 200 programs to school children in local schools, this year over 300 programs are scheduled.

For further information about programs, call the Victims Research Center, 823-0765 and ask for Mary Llewellyn, Educational Counselor.

Dallas woman opens new electrolysis shop

Sheila McAllister has brought electrolysis to the Back Mountain. The slender, dark-haired young Dallas resident opened her business in the Professional Building, Route 309, Dallas, in mid-December.

Sheila, who developed an interest in electrolysis, the only safe and permanent method of removing superfluous or abnormal hair growth, when she realized the number of men and women seeking a solution that would free them from the daily effort of maintaining a hair-free look on their face, legs and body.

Originally planning to study in Boston, when Sheila moved from New Hampshire to the Back Mountain with her husband and family, she found a licensed school locally and enrolled in the 300-hour course. She completed the course and became a licensed electrologist, Nov. 1, and after spending a great deal of time looking for just the right location finally opened her business in the Professional Building.

A native of Georgia, Sheila and her husband lived in Kingston for approximately two and a half years, then moved to New Hampshire for a short time. When Sheila's husband was transferred to the local area, they came to the Back Mountain with their daughter, April, aged 8½, and son, Daniel, 29 months.

Sheila said she finds the profession very rewarding since she can see the successful results, both psychologically and physically, of the treatments.

"There are a lot of people with superfluous hair, who would like to have it permanently and safely removed," she said. "Every person differs and what is normal for some is abnormal for others."

Sheila takes a personal interest in each patron and treatments last from 15 minutes to an hour depending on the tolerance level of the patron, density of the hair and the area where it is.

She offers a free consultation during which Sheila explains the process of hair growth, what to expect during a treatment, answers questions relative to the electrolysis and gives a brief treatment. Sheila offers the latter so the patrons may have some idea what electrolysis is like and so that she better understands the patrons reactions.

Although electrolysis is primarily a cosmetic method, it also plays a psychological and physical role in making the person with an overabundance of hair feel better when the hair is permanently removed.

Electrolysis remains the only method of hair removal approved by the Food and Drug Administration. Statistics, according to Sheila, show that eight out of every 10 women have unwanted hair. So do many men, although they do not take advantage of the method as readily as most women.

The process is also tax deductible under the medical category by the I.R.S. and is the only method of hair removal accepted by the American Medical Association.

Not only is Sheila a licensed electrologist but since she is a member of the Pennsylvania Society of Electrologists and the American Electrolysis Association she is entitled to attend seminars, workshops and symposiums where she continues to receive advanced education.

Since Sheila has a personal concern for each patron, her schedule is by appointment only. In order to treat each patron effectively, she works about 30 hours weekly. Some require more attention and time than others.

Interested persons may call for an appointment at 675-8563, Monday through Friday from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m., and Saturday from 9 a.m. to noon. Appointments for consultations are confidential and conducted in the privacy of Sheila McAllister's office. The time spent to discuss electrolysis and its advantages may be the beginning of a patron's commitment that should have been made long ago.
