Don't move pests into new areas

"Don't move an old pest to a new neighborhood" is the message now being carried to local movers by the U.S. Department of Agriculture. "It's ironic - but the season to prevent spread of gypsy moths is the time when they do absolutely no damage," says Daniel Kepich officer in charge of the local USDA office for Plant Protection and Quarantine.

People heave a sigh of relief when gypsy moth caterpillars disappear, and that's no surprise. There's little to like about a pest that strips the leaves from trees, litters streets and disfigures the landscape with crawling caterpillars, shreds of wasted leaves and excrement. But the rub is that when the annoying caterpillars disappear, their eggs remain. Quietly, without eating another morsel, the insect pupates into its adult stage, mates, and lays a large mound, or mass of eggs. That means trouble, not only for the neighborhoods where the eggs overwinter to hatch into more hungry caterpillars next spring, but also for far-way places that may never have heard about gypsy moths. Every year, recently, new gypsy moth eggs brought from the heavily infested Northeast have started new colonies as far away as California, Oregon and Washington. Almost invariably, gypsy moth eggs get to new destinations by riding along on outdoor household goods when people move. I'm talking about swing sets, automobile tires, picnic tables and other items people tend to keep out of doors.

When the eggs laid in early August here in Dallas hatch the following spring, they develop into leaf-munching larvae just as readily in Tennessee or California as they would in their home state. That's why the USDA has started a campaign to have movers tell their customers about this threat. Even though most folks in this area know about gypsy moths, people need the reminder. At moving time, a hundred pesky details occupy your mind. You don't think about gypsy moths and their egg masses hidden in your outdoor goods. Movers can remind you of the risk, so that you won't get a bad name in your new neighborhood for having brought gypsy moths with you. Movers have a personal stake in preventing gypsy moth spread. They can be fined if the paperwork carried with the move doesn't include a certificate of gypsy moth inspection. Although gypsy

STDs stands for Sexually Transmitted Diseases, a large group of diseases usually spread during sexual activity. STDs include venereal diseases such as gonorrhea and syphilis, and many other problems such as vaginitis, urinary tract infections, herpes and AIDS. People are talking about them more than ever before. Newspapers, magazines and talk shows commonly report the latest news and controversies about STDs, yet there are moth egg masses are fairly large in size - ranging from dime-sized to about two inches across - it takes a thorough inspection and a keen eye to detect the egg masses. You can do the inspection yourself before you move and then sign a form available from USDA. Or, you can hire a certified pest control specialist who has had training in detecting gypsy moth eggs. We have a list of operators who are qualified to do this job. In any case, get a copy of our booklet, "Don't Move Gypsy Moths" before you move. It's available from movers or from our local office. Or write Publications Distribution, USDA-APHIS, G-187 Federal Building, Hyattsville, MD 20782, and ask for PA 1329. This booklet tells how an inspection for gypsy moth eggs is done and includes a checklist of items to inspect for the do-it-yourselfer.
