Volunteers clean up cemetery

By JOHN HOINSKI Staff Writer

A group of Dallas residents concerned over the dilapidated and deteriorating condition of the Rice Cemetery on Huntsville Road have begun a voluntary cleanup drive in an effort to restore the site.

Getting cleaned up

"We just feel the people buried there deserve a little more respect," said Jack Fowler, one of the volunteers.

"Right now we are trying to clean it out and set up the tombstones that have been knocked down and scattered," Fowler added. "But the problem is that we're not sure where they belong. We've been down at the Courthouse to see if there is any way we can find out."

Jim Davis, a resident of Davenport Street, initiated the action when he approached the Borough Council at the last monthly meeting to get their help in the project.

"We talked to Jerry Machell and Ted Montross, but all the board members were supportive," Davis said. "We've been up here using chain saws and axes to clear the weeds and tree limbs and the council has sent up a truck to haul the debris away.'

Davis said he doesn't know how long the project will take, but one where we can find that out, please thing is for sure, there is much contact us and let us know. work to be done.

"There are a lot of markers here indicating the graves of the people buried here, but they are covered by dirt and trees and a lot of them are scattered around. So we're not sure where they belong," said

"They use to have that informa-tion about the layout of the cemetery stored in a building up here but it was destroyed some time back," he added. "If anybody has an idea

Another significant move was to reorient daytime serials toward a younger female audience and male audience, which now includes large numbers of students, unemployed males, mothers and grandmothers.

Dramatic serials have become
