Police

1990, they will receive another $640 raise, and in 1991 an additional $830 under the terms of the three-year contract.

The police association had asked for a salary schedule that put patrolmen who had completed their six month probationary period at $17,501 in 1989, and reached $19,129 in 1991.

Adam Hozempa, Jr., of Adam's Clothes in the Shavertown Shopping Center was outspoken in his opinion of the officers' salaries. "What they make is lousy," he said.

"They should be making around $24,000."

Hozempa, like other businesspersons interviewed, has called on the police for assistance, and has been pleased with their response.

"I think they are really good. Anytime we call them they're here within a minute," he said.

Margaret Dymond of Shavertown said she has noticed the high turnover rate on the force, because, "I used to know a lot of them, but not anymore. It must be tough (to live on the salaries) if they have a family."

The arbitrator's awards cover the period from January 1, 1989 to December 31, 1991.

"This award jeopardizes the quality of law enforcement because police departments in the Back Mountain will now be nothing but stepping stones. Officers see no future here," said Moravec when asked how his group feels about the award. "The Back Mountain is an excellent place to work and live, but the salaries make it impossible to survive, let alone live," he added.
