Chief Sabol, however, said he supports the decision and the law. "They got to the party somehow, and they planned on getting home somehow," Sabol said Friday. He said that in past years juveniles used bicycles or walked to drinking parties, but juveniles are now driving cars to the parties.

"We want to protect our kids," Sabol said. He explained that the law may be viewed as hurting the juveniles, but said that maybe the law has to hurt juveniles to protect them.

However, parents of some teens arrested under the new law are not so sure the law is fair. Allan and Louise Scott's 20-year-old daughter was arrested earlier this year for "constructive possession". According to her parents and the police, she was not drinking alcohol and no alcohol was open in the home.

"There was beer in the kitchen refrigerator, that is all," said Louise Monday. "There was no beer near (their daughter) or in the room according to the police."

The Scotts and their daughter admit there was a party at the residence prior to the girl's arrival, but when police raided the residence no drinking was occurring.

The Scotts say their daughter was not drinking alcohol. "They didn't even test her. You're in the room, therefore you are drinking," Allan Scott said.

"You can not even demand a breathalyzer test," Louise pointed out. "She said the denial of the test was unfair. 'If you are willing to take it, why not?'"

Both parents also attacked the law for allowing the juveniles' drivers licenses to be suspended for 90 days. "If you are drinking in a car or transporting the alcohol I could understand it," Louise said. "But

(the daughter) was not near a motor vehicle at all. The law is not fair to someone sitting in an apartment. Why, then, is a motor vehicle involved?"

Sabol admitted there was a downside to the law. He pointed out that parents are often strongly against the suspension of their children's driver's licenses "because the parents then have to haul their kids around everywhere."

Allan Scott pointed out what he feels is one of the biggest problems with the "constructive possession" clause. According to the law, any juvenile arrested on the premises where alcohol is present is guilty of "constructive possession". Allan said that if the law was taken literally, any social function could result in minors being arrested.

He used weddings as an example. He said that since alcohol is served at a wedding reception and children are present, the police could "bust in and arrest everyone." He also spoke of certain religious functions where alcohol is served.

Louise Scott also found this a flaw in the law. "Any place you are where there is alcohol," she explained. "It could be a restaurant where alcohol is served. Legally police could come in there and arrested everyone."

The Scotts said they refused to allow their daughter to be found guilty of something she did not do, so they hired an attorney to fight the charges. She was found not guilty because, as the judge put it, he was in a good mood.

According to the Scotts, the judge told their daughter that if she had a judge who felt differently about the law or just had a bad day, she could have easily been convicted, even though she was not drinking and no alcohol was open at the residence.
