Kingston Township plans to sue water company

By SCOTT A. DAVIS
Post Staff

The Kingston Township Supervisors voted unanimously last Wednesday to allow Solicitor Benjamin R. Jones to file suit against the Dallas/ Shavertown Water Company in an attempt to force the company to clean up a potential health hazard.

The suit surrounds property owned by the water company located at the corner of Johnson Street and Stafford Street in Trucksville.

"There are two problems," said Township Manager Jeffrey Box Tuesday. He explained that two opposite parcels of land pose a threat to the safety of nearby residents.

One parcel contains an old, abandoned well house foundation. "This structure consists of crumbling debris," said Box. "It is an attractive nuisance to children." Box said the township fears children may be injured while playing near the structure.

On the second parcel located on the opposite side of the street, an old water tank has been abandoned. "This tank has been left there propped up by stones," Box commented. "If it became dislodged, it could roll and cause injury to someone or damage some property."

Box said the township has attempted unsuccessfully to have the water company voluntarily clean up the property, "so the solicitor is preparing the necessary legal action."

The water company contacted the township following the decision to take legal action, according to Box. "They said they would clean up the property by Wednesday," he said. "If it is cleaned up, we will withdraw any legal action."
