Filling the strips

PennDOT crews were in Dallas Borough Monday filling in one of the rumble strips that were put on Route 309. The strips have been the center of much controversy as the public has criticized the borough and PennDOT for putting the strips on the highway in order to warn motorists of an upcoming curve. Jones that the two boys had made up a story to testify but they didn't carry it out completely.

"They didn't play out the script right. You saw it fall apart right here," Albert told the jury while mentioning some discrepancies in the boys testimony.

Albert said all the boys had to do when entering the bar was take what they wanted because the merchandise was all over the back room.

Assistant District Attorney James Phillips was the prosecutor in the case. He told the jury that there were some discrepancies in the boys story but that is because, "when the incident occurred the youths didn't think they'd be here, so why should they pay attention to the details of what happened." Phillips said that there were enough similarities in the testimony to make the boys' story believable. He also said that other evidence submitted was enough to convict Jones.

The jury deliberated for two-and-a-half hours before finding Jones guilty of selling, furnishing or giving beer and alcohol to minors and corruption of minors.

Jones was acquitted on one charge of selling, furnishing or giving beer to minors.

Jones' wife, Eleanor, was also charged in the incident but she was acquitted on all counts.

Sentencing in the case has not been scheduled at this time.

A hearing of the Pennsylvania Liquor Control Board on the incident will be held next month.
