Dreams

A dream is an order of ideas, thoughts, emotions, images or memories, often repressed from consciousness, which passes through our minds during the rapid eye movements (REM) stage of sleep. REM sleep is the fifth stage of sleep, occurring after the stages of moderate and deep sleep, which alternate with each other. REM sleep is characterized by heart and breathing patterns similar to those during the first awake stage of sleep. Nightmares also occur during REM sleep, but night terrors occur in the third and fourth sleep stages.

Through a process known as dream analysis, people can gain access to their unconscious minds by examining the contents of their dreams. Some psychotherapists consider dream content to be an important factor in therapy. They and other persons who specialize in dream analysis may help people to unlock important thoughts and feelings expressed in dreams by using free association and other techniques.

Dreams are thought to be made up of our own unfinished business in daily life. Intense dreams tend to represent deeply felt conflicts or events. Some of us dream in color, and others do not. Some people dream very little or not at all, and some of us rarely remember our dreams.

Scientists who study dreams say that many dream images are universal within a specific culture. For example, doors tend to represent passageways to some kind of change. Dreaming of several people sometimes is a way of looking at several aspects of our own personalities--all the people may be various side of ourselves. Dreams of animals may represent certain sides of our personalities also; a cuddly animal which turns into a ferocious monster may be a way of showing ourselves we are filled with unexpressed anger about some conflict. Dreams may represent unfulfilled wishes, too.

The less pleasant side of dreaming is the nightmare or night terror. The difference in the two, besides their occurrence at different stages of sleep, is that nightmares have storylines that the person can remember the next day. Night terrors usually consist of one terrifying image that causes the sleeper to suddenly wake, sometimes screaming in fear. This fearful state may last many minutes, and yet the person may go back to sleep and remember nothing of the entire episode the next morning.

Night terrors appear to occur even in infancy and are not uncommon in children. They usually disappear as the child grows up. Night terrors in adults, however, are often related to a significant problem. Whether child or adult, anyone with a history of disturbing nightmares or night terrors should seek help at a sleep disorder center or from a therapist.
