DR. ROBERT GREENHALGH PRESENTS

TO YOUR HEALTH

Otitis Media - middle ear infections

Why are my children so prone to ear infections?

The ear infections your child suffers from are most likely middle ear infections, known as otitis media. Middle ear infections, which affect half of all children by age one, and ninety percent of them by age six, is swelling or infection of the middle ear. The problem is caused by any one of a variety of bacteria or viruses, or by allergy or fungus. Often there is a cold or throat infection before the onset of the middle ear infection.

Bacteria and viruses get into the middle ear through the eustachian tube, which opens into the mouth and throat. A cold or sore throat can prevent the tube from draining normally, and a blocked tube is the perfect place for bacteria or viruses to grow. In some cases, the increased pressure of the fluid within the middle ear can force infection into the porous mastoid bone next to the ear, or break the eardrum. The combination of a small eustachian tube and a relatively immature immune system makes children more prone to middle ear infection.

Middle ear infections can be very painful with symptoms that include a sense of fullness in the ear, fever and hearing loss. Hearing is affected when the accumulated fluid prevents the eardrum from vibrating - necessary for transmitting sound into the interior portions of the ear.

Otitis media is never a problem to be treated lightly, because if hearing is impaired for any length of time, a child can quickly get behind in learning and language skills. Otitis media is the most common cause of hearing loss in children.

Antibiotics are used successfully in treating otitis media in most children. However, in children who have stubborn or recurrent middle ear problems that affect hearing and classroom learning, a minor surgical procedure to drain the fluid may be necessary. Some children may, at that time, require the placement of a tiny tube through the eardrum that provides continuous draining for as long as the tube remains in the ear, usually 6 months to a year.

This health awareness is brought to you as a service to the Back Mountain community by Robert Greenhalgh, M.D. Dr. Greenhalgh is a Back Mountain physician who offers general pediatric, gynecology, and geriatric medical care, on a personal basis.
