Game Nies

Luzerne County - I recently received a call that a raccoon was in a bar. When I arrived at the scene a waitress pointed to a door and said, "He's in there". As I opened the door of the dimly lit room, I could not see the animal, but then heard a noise from behind me. The raccoon was busy tearing open a case of Michelob. I quickly tranquilized the critter and as I was carrying it from the room, I glanced back over my shoulder and could not help but wonder how many others were tranquilized on this very spot. - WCO Donald R. DR. ROBERT GREENHALGH PRESENTS

TO YOUR HEALTH

AIDS - Is the dentist or surgeon infected? If so, does the patient have the right to know?

This is an area of considerable debate presently, inside and outside the dental and medical professions. Public awareness has been heightened by the case of the Florida dentist who had kept his AIDS illness a secret, then later several of his patients developed positive tests for the AIDS virus. Subsequent detailed laboratory tests showed the patients' particular AIDS virus strain (type) closely matched the strain of AIDS virus which the dentist had.

Since that case, several interest groups have been heard from.

The American Medical Association, and American Dental Association published a joint statement (1/17/91) which recommends that physicians and dentists who come in contact with blood should voluntarily undergo screening, and warn their patients if they turn out to be positive for the AIDS virus.

The Federal Center for Disease Control (CDC) is considering mandatory titing of those healthcare workers who perform "highly invasive procedures", which are further defined as having the healthcare workers had and a sharp object inside a patient's body.

AIDS support groups are opposed to testing of physicians in general, because the consequence could be the reluctance of doctors to practice in areas with many AIDS cases.

All of the above take place with the knowledge that risk of AIDS transmission is quite small, when there is needlestick injury or scalpel stick injury. Yet the risk does exist.

The final end result of present debate about who must be AIDS-tested, and how often, may get a strong push from legal liability lawsuits. If dental malpractice carriers, and medical malpractice carriers begin to be sued for AIDS transmission, then they are likely to require dentists and doctors to be tested, in order for insurance to be issued. Eventually, even the public at large will be more widely tested, as the AIDS epidemic gets large enough, and the need to obtain accurate data becomes overriding. That has always been the situation when important epidemics have occurred in the past.
