Childhood eye injuries

What are the most common childhood eye injuries and how should they be treated?

The summer months bring with them more outdoor sports for children and more eye injuries of a special kind--those caused by baseball and bats, various kinds of racquet sports, basketballs, and even other children's fists. Sport-related injuries are responsible for about two-thirds of pediatric eye emergencies.

Sadly, another major source of problems is BB guns, which can cause very serious damage, as can firecrackers--the other common cause of child eye accidents during the summer.

Most eye injuries should be treated by a physician. If the injury is serious enough, your family doctor or pediatrician will send you on to a specialist.

Sports accidents tend to result in bruises, lacerations, orbital fractures, and more seriously, bleeding inside the eye or a ruptured globe. Superficial bruises, scratches on lids, and even corneal abrasions can usually be treated by the family doctor. Fireworks explosions and BB-gun injuries or other injuries which penetrate, rupture, or cause something to be lodged in the eye and which cause bleeding inside the eye, should have the input of an ophthalmologist. You will probably be sent to a specialist also if there are lacerations which are more than a simple scratch, for example if there is some tissue loss or involvement of the tear drainage system.

Another type of eye injury which requires an ophthalmologist's attention (and which occurs in adults as well) is the burn caused by household cleaners, gasoline, fertilizer or other chemicals. The first thing to do in this case, before anything else, is to flush the eyes with lots of tap water. Then worry about calling the doctor, and the doctor will probably want to see you right away.

There is nothing you need keep in the medicine cabinet for eye injuries. A far better precaution is prevention. Close parental supervision of children taking part in sports activities is recommended by experts. And of course, keep all household chemicals out of reach.

There is one very important investment you can make--protective eye-guards for your child, preferably with polycarbonate lenses. Even while playing baseball, glasses with plastic lenses would be better than nothing, and the special eye-guards should be mandatory for racquet sports and hockey. Supervision of children around fireworks during Fourth-of-July celebrations will also do much to reduce injuries.
