Troop #281 caves 200' underground

Recently members of Dallas Boys Scout Troop #281 joined Bloomsburg University's 'Quest' program in a speological journey 'under' Pleasant Gap, Pennsylvania in Centre County. "Speology" or caving as it is more commonly known is an exciting exploration of the underground world that few have seen or experienced. Led by Karen Michelson, quest team leader, 15 members of the troop using carbide and electric battery lamps explored J-4, a large cave located in Pleasant Gap within an abandoned stone quarry a few miles east of Beaver Stadium. Learning basic cave navigation, caving ethics, safety procedures, as well as the in and outs of numerous pieces of caving equipment scouts weaved, crawled, and slid their way over 200 feet underground.

DETECTING BABY'S VISION PROBLEM

There isn't much a baby can see clearly when he's first born. He doesn't have the ability yet to focus quickly or accurately. In the beginning, each eye tends to act independently of the other. It takes a while before he learns how to use both eyes to see well. As time goes on, if baby still doesn't seem to be seeing well, he should have an eye examination. There are certain telltale signs a parent can watch for: Does your child find it difficult to pick up small objects? When he reaches for a toy, does he miss it completely? When he starts to walk and hustle around the house, do you often see him stumbling over things that he should have seen and avoided? Check to see if he is using both eyes to focus on an object. If he tilts his head to look at something, or squints or closes one eye to look closely at something, there may be a vision problem. An eye examination is the only way you can be sure.
