Gilgallon to leadership seminar

Margaret Gilgallon, a sophomore at Bishop O'Reilly High School, Kingston, represented her school at the Central Pennsylvania Leadership Seminar held in Lancaster County recently.

The seminar took place at Millersville University in Millersville. Its purpose was to provide leadership training to sophomore students from across the state selected on a merit basis. Students in attendance met with leaders in the areas of business, the arts and education who shared their insight and knowledge with the group.

The daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Gilgallon of Shavertown, Margaret heard leaders discuss ethics in business, public vs. private perception, the legislative process, and the quality of the American educational system, along with other student ambassadors, she was also given a tour of the State House of Representatives where she studied the process of passing bills through the legislature.

Lyme Disease

What is Lyme Disease? Is it true you can only get it in New England in the summer?

Lyme disease was first described in 1976 in Lyme, Conn. It is caused by a bacteria carried by the deer tick, a small tick about the size of a freckle. The disease appears to be spreading, and has been reported in concentrations in New England from north of Boston along the Massachusetts coast through southern Rhode Island, southern New York, and as far south as Virginia; also in mid-Wisconsin and Minnesota; and in the Pacific northwest, in Oregon and Washington. The disease has appeared sporadically in other countries as well.

The disease usually strikes from May through August. Victims often are vacationers who have been in high grasses on beach dunes and in areas populated by deer.

Lyme disease has flu-like symptoms at first. There can be fever, headaches and muscle pain. One month later, a rash may appear, but not everyone gets a rash. Usually children do not get it, which is unfortunate because the rash is unique-looking and is a good clue as to whether you have the disease.

The rash usually appears on the extremities, often the thigh, and often there is only one lesion, which gradually enlarges into a doughnut-like shape, red on the outside and clear on the inside. The lesion can get as large as one foot in diameter, and may burn or itch. If untreated, the disease can progress to meningitis-like symptoms with headaches, a stiff neck, sensitivity to bright light, and paralysis of facial nerves. Next may come such arthritic symptoms as joint pain and swelling. Finally, and rarely, there may be heart block, a condition manifested by palpitations of the heart, chest pain or fainting spells.

Lyme disease is treatable at the rash stage with antibiotics, although doctors are currently determining which antibiotics are most effective. Tetracycline seems to be the best so far, but it cannot be given to children under seven because it stains their permanent teeth. The next best drug seems to be oral penicillin. For young children who are allergic to penicillin erythromycin has been used, but it doesn't appear to be very effective. Studies are now under way to find better treatments.

You can protect yourself against Lyme disease by taking a few precautions. The organism isn't found in sand or water, so you're safe if boating or swimming. But if you will be in high grass on sand dunes, or in brush or wooded areas populated by deer, wear a long-sleeve shirt, long pants, and tuck your pant cuffs into your socks.

Wear light clothing so you can see the ticks and brush them off. Try to shower every day if you're in an endemic area, because even if the tick gets on your skin, it often doesn't attach itself right away. And if it is attached, it doesn't always transmit the bacteria immediately. You may be able to wash it off before there is any chance of infection.
