The students and teachers at Lake-Noxen Elementary School have seen nearly 100 VIP's this year.

Part of a pilot program in the district, Volunteers in Partnership consisted of some very important people: parents and grandparents assisting with the preschool program, in the art room and with non-teaching duties; Peer Helpers from the high school who served as role models, working with children on a one-to-one basis; junior high school students who stayed after school to set up Lake-Noxen's art show and other special projects, and friends from the community, who shared travel slides, special collections and their experiences in banking, economics, ethnic customs, the environment, newspaper reporting and other areas related to regular classroom lessons.

Other visitors discussed the deaf community and its use of special telephone equipment and American Sign Language, the work of Geisinger's Life Flight Trauma Team, dental health and hygiene and traditional Native American legends.

"The visits from our community resource persons were valuable learning experiences for the students," said principal Robert Kunkle.

"Learning how their math skills apply to banking and economics, actually meeting Foreign Exchange students from the countries that they have read about in social studies classes and having role models, the 'big kids' from the high school discuss peer pressure and living drug and alcohol-free lives has really broadened their horizons."

VIP coordinator Joyce Birt said that as of May 1, the program's 92 volunteers have logged more than 350 volunteer hours.

The program is expected to continue next year.
