tial areas, where homeowners or their private snowplowers are pushing snow from driveways onto roads, causing traffic hazards.

People are also parking their cars in designated snowplow truck turnarounds, Manta said.

"While we were out this last weekend with the plows trying to widen the roads, people were complaining because we put some snow back on their driveways," he said.

The supervisors said that they are reviewing a snow removal ordinance which will address these problems.

In other business the supervisors voted to:

- Appoint Edward Havrilla to replace Austin Howard on the zoning board. Howard resigned in January.

- Hire two or three part-time road crew employees for snow removal, on an as-needed basis for $7 per hour.

- Send two people to a free "Road Scholar" program at Penn State in Allentown.

- Contract with urban planner Marlene Pawlowski to prepare new township zoning and property line maps for $300.
