Trees a danger, neighbor says

By JENNIFER JUDGE

DALLAS TWP. - Anthony Westawski has approached the Dallas Township Supervisors seven times about overgrown pine trees in a cemetery adjacent to his property. "We're living in fear of those trees and there's no reason for it," Westawski told the supervisors at their May meeting.

The pine trees that are causing all the problems are located in the Dohl-Yeager Cemetery on Overbrook Road, a cemetery that hasn't been maintained in some time. "That's been left unmaintained for the 27 years I've been police chief," Carl Miers said. The supervisors explained that Boy Scouts used to come in to clean up the cemetery, but had to stop for fear that the condition of the pine trees made the job unsafe.

The supervisors are reluctant to act, though. No one is sure who owns the property. "In this day and age when everybody is ready to sue, I can't see spending the money to cut them down," Chairperson Phil Walter said. Supervisor Frank Wagner added, "There are no funds available at this time."

Westawski has suffered damage to his vehicle from the trees. On a particularly windy Sunday,

"If it's dangerous, we're going to take care of it."

a branch fell and damaged the cap on Westawski's truck. Westawski believes the issue goes beyond property rights. "When you have something that's a hazard to people or homes, you mean you can't cut the trees down?" he asked.

Frank Townend, Dallas Township solicitor, suggested, "I suppose you could advertise and see if anybody objects."

"Anything to get them out of here," Westawski responded. "Just a pine cone coming down from that high, you're going to feel it."

Wagner expressed concern that a falling branch could possibly damage a headstone in the cemetery. Townend told Westawski, "If it's dangerous, we're going to take care of it." Although the township is unable to act until Townend researches the legality of removing the trees, the supervisors asked Townend to begin the process.
