Students exposed to 'Tar Wars' program

Local physician assistants Joann Maranki, Colleen Reynolds, LeAnn Ostrowski, Bill Reynolds and Jill Steidl became teachers for one hour as they presented a tobacco-free education program to the eager fifth-grade students of Lehman-Jackson and Dallas Elementary schools.

Tar Wars is a lively, interactive national program that teaches children how NOT to start using tobacco. It is sponsored by the American Academy of Family Physicians and endorsed by the Pennsylvania Society of Physician Assistants.

The talk began by showing the short-term effects of smoking or chewing, from bad breath to coughing to cost. Next the students learned the effects of tobacco on the body, including how it actually felt to have decreased air to one's lungs by breathing through a straw. Math experts in the class illustrated how much it costs to use cigarettes for one month and one year, and their classmates volunteered how they would rather spend the money.

Students then talked about why people begin to use tobacco. Most thought smoking made one look cool, but wondered how smokers could really be popular if they smelled bad or spit chewing tobacco. Actors of the class demonstrated how hard it can be to withstand peer pressure and thought about what they would say to their friends if asked to try a cigarette. Several students heard that people use tobacco because it is relaxing, but learned that nicotine was a stimulant and the opposite was true. It was the consensus that a person craving a cigarette was not relaxed!

In preparation, students had collected tobacco ads from magazines and brought them to the Tar Wars presentation. Student identified the ads' marketing strategy and talked about how truthful the ad was in depicting a brand name and the kind of people who use it.

At the conclusion of the presentation, the national Tar Wars Poster contest was announced. Students were asked to design a poster to emphasize the positive effects of not using tobacco. The posters are judged by local people of the community, with the winner entered in the state poster contest. The winner of the Lehman-Jackson contest was Audrey Supey of Dallas. Dan Savage was awarded first place at Dallas Elementary. The winner of the national poster contest last year won a trip for four to Disneyworld.

Students have donated their posters to local schools and businesses for ongoing tobacco awareness, prevention, and education.
