Misericordia leader is bullish on NEPA

By RONALD BARTIZEK

DALLAS - Dr. Michael MacDowell, the president of College Misericordia, has a vision for the future of northeastern Pennsylvania, and it's one that might surprise a few people.

Describing his hopes for the region at the April 15 meeting of the Back Mountain Business and Professional Association, MacDowell said the forces that drive economic expansion have changed, and this area is equipped to take advantage of the changes, in large part because its colleges and universities turn out thousands of capable graduates each year.

For decades, business and industry was "capital intensive," dependent on equipment and materials. Today's growing businesses use "human capital. Supplying that human capital is the most important thing these institutions can do," MacDowell said.

Acknowledging that he might seem unrealistic, MacDowell said the region has the potential to become a vibrant growth area. "That's my dream. Call me silly, but I believe we can have a miniature 'Research Triangle' in northeastern Pennsylvania," he said, alluding to the Raleigh-Durham area of North Carolina. That area and others, such as California's Silicon Valley or the Rt. 128 beltway around Boston, developed around the "brain power" of nearby colleges and universities.

The challenge, MacDowell said, is to convince local graduates to stay in the area and create wealth and jobs for them-selfs and others. He gave several examples of successful businesses run by graduates of local universities and colleges, and suggested not enough is made of the those cases while complaints about the region's failings are heard too often.

"We don't know how lucky we are," MacDowell said, after telling BMBPA members about two recent hirings at the college, both of whom had graduated, moved away to larger metropolitan areas, then wished to return because of the quality of life here.

MacDowell also described new activity at the campus. Merrick Hall, which houses the college bookstore and dining hall, is being remodeled at a cost of about $1 million. The bookstore will be enlarged and relocated to the side of the building facing the parking area.

The new campus library will be dedicated Sept. 24, which is the 75th anniversary of the opening of the college. Also, the campus will host seven Elderhostel sessions this summer, and a summer reading program will be instituted for young children and their parents. "We're trying to break a cycle of poverty that exists in the area," MacDowell said.
