Mayor

said. "Borough council was sort of the next logical step."

The new mayor had been a council member since 1991 and had served as council president for four of those years. He assumes the mayoral reins at a time of general prosperity in the borough. "I just hope to keep the train on track because right now we're running pretty good," said Cooper.

Dallas borough is currently operating in the black and that makes the new mayor very happy. "It used to be, we would start the year with a tax loss anticipation and we'd have to sweat it out to the end," said Cooper. "Now, because of good sound management and smart investments, we have a surplus."

The good economic conditions also have a downside. The prosperity may be making it difficult to fill positions on the town council. There are four borough council seats available in this year's election but only two applicants, both incumbents, have announced their candidacy.

"I think there are benefits and detriments to the current situation," said councilman Charles Kane. "People are happy with the way things are going so they don't feel there is a need to become personally involved with the process."

One of the officials seeking re-election was sworn in as a council member, at the April 20 meeting filling the position made available by Cooper's resignation. William Berti was nominated to the council and will serve the time remaining in Cooper's term prior to likely starting a four-year term of his own.

Bill Peiffer, who is also on the ballot in May's primary, currently serves as council vice president. "Dallas has come so far from where we started in 1991 when I was first appointed to the council," he said. "At that time, the borough was basically broke."

An increasing tax base is a critical component to the economic revival of the borough. "We are always looking to attract new business to the town," said Cooper. "Projects like the Twin Stacks development are great for the local economy and the community as a whole."

Leadership is also crucial to the continued growth according to the new mayor. "I am very comfortable working with this council; the integrity of its members is most important to successful government," he said.

Anyone wishing to have a voice in borough politics over the next four years is encouraged to contact the borough office at 675-1389 to find out about becoming a write-in candidate in the primary election to be held May 18.
