Game Comm. warns against handling animals in wild

Rabies, distemper, ticks, lice and other parasites are all good reasons not to handle wildlife. Each spring nature renews itself and the outdoors is full of wildlife young. Occasionally these young animals come in contact with humans. Someone mowing grass may expose a nest of young rabbits, a fawn is discovered bleating for its mother, a raccoon or coyote pup may wander into someone's yard. Under no circumstance should the public pick up or handle such animals.

Rabies is a real and serious threat to public safety, as are diseases transmitted by animal parasites. Recently a coyote pup was picked up and taken to a soft ball game where approximately 35 children and adults handled the animal. In another case, a chipmunk was taken where it bit a child. In Wilkes-Barre, a child carried a bat home and was bitten. In all these cases, the animals are being tested for rabies.

Wildlife must never be handled or taken from its natural habitat. Often these animals are not orphaned. The bleating fawn's mother or the doe rabbit will return to feed its hungry young when it is safe. The fox vixen or female coyote will rescue its errant young if left alone. Wild animals do not abandon their young, however, if for some reason the parent is believed to be dead, contact the Game Commission. Never pick up a wild animal no matter how cute they may be. Not even with gloves!
