Youths learn, compete on the shooting range

By CHRIS DEMON

Recently in a place called Scotia Range kids from around the state competed in the National Rifle Association's Youth Hunter Education Challenge or YHEC as participants affectionately call it.

The youngsters competed in eight different events. Shooting categories such as black powder, shotgun, rifle and archery were the highlights of the day. Other events were wildlife identification, hunger safety trails, hunter responsibility exam and orienteer-

The YHEC program accepts youngsters up to age of 19 who compete in teams from Scout troop, 4-H or hunting clubs. Statewide there were several hundred that competed for the chance to show their outdoor abilities at the national competition in New Mexico.

The program has been in existence since 1985 and draws more than 15,000 competitors nationwide. It was designed to teach young hunters safety, ethics and marksmanship. Besides the scheduled events that take place there are specialized clinics to teach kids about game calling, reloading and advanced hunting

The rifle competition utilizes .22 caliber rifles fired at life-sized animal targets at various distances. In the muzzleloader event, competitors shoot at silhouette targets the size of woodchucks at ranges out to 100 yards with open sights. Many of these kids are phenomenal shots and it proves it when a 12-yearold can hit a target smaller than a paper plate at 100 yards with a muzzleloader with open sights.

The shotgun event provides the call 1-800-672-3888.

cheerleaders are encouraged to attend.

test their skills in a variety of hunting conditions ranging from rabbit and pheasant to grouse and quail. The shooters also try to hit flying clay birds to test their shooting abilities.

The archery is designed as a walk-through course that has participants shoot at life-size 3-d targets. The animals are placed at various distances, which forces the shooters to correctly range their target and hit vital ar-

Other activities such as orienteering teach kids how to read a map and compass and force them to find their way in the woods using these two items; a necessary skill to any backwoods hunter. The wildlife identification segment of the YHEC program teaches youngsters how to identify tracks, feathers and other signs left by animals, all valuable things to know to be a successful outdoorsman.

The people who run the events are truly dedicated individuals in their own right. The men and women spend their days teaching and testing these young sportsmen for the many reasons. Some do it for the future of their beloved sport, while others may do it to pass down their spirit, ethics and love for the outdoors. For whatever reason, they do it all on a volunteer basis. Some of the volunteers don't even have children of their own; they just do it because it just "seems like the right thing to do."

If you would like to volunteer, sponsor or participate in the Youth Hunter Education Challenge, you can gain the necessary information for doing so at the NRA's website at www.nra.org or
