rated athletes on the course, has won the event numerous times since first coming to the area in the mid-1980s.

"I just like the community atmosphere of this race," Smyers said. "I do better the more familiar I am with a course."

Dallas natives Sean Robbins and Tracey Polliard-McGurk were the top local male and female amateurs on the day.

Robbins completed the 1.5K swim, 40K cycle and 11K run 16th overall in 2:16:52, while Polliard-McGurk was the top local female for the seventh time in her career, crossing the finish line in 2:27:09.

"I didn't do anything this week. I was tired," said Robbins, who competed in an Ironman Triathlon qualifier event in Lake Placid, N.Y., last weekend. "I felt like I had some speed, but I didn't have the endurance. But that compounded with the heat — I'm happy with my performance."

Robbins will compete in the Ironman in Hawaii later in the year.

Competitors fought not only a tough Wilkes-Barre Triathlon course, but also fought 90-plus degree temperatures throughout the day — one of the hottest days in the triathlon's 21-year history.

"It was extremely hot and I was a little over my head on the bike, and I paid for it on the run," Robbins said. "The run was shaded but really hot, so I kind of just worked my way through it."

"It was really tough."

Mother Nature

"This is the worst year by far," Prohaska said. "We've even had a few runners that we've had to pull off the track and bring them in on a cart."

"We never had to do that before."

Koine said race officials were prepared for the worst — and seemingly got it.

"We did expect it and had planned for it with the past few days of high temperatures the way they were," Koine said. "We did plan for this. We had ambulance units out on the course,"

three paramedic units on site, a physician, RNs and EMTs here."

For top female professional finisher and regular participant Karen Smyers, not even the best preparation could have prepared her for Sunday's weather conditions.

"It was pretty hot on the run, and with a couple of miles to go I started to get chills, which is a sign of overheating," Smyers said. "I was being pretty careful,

"I knew it was going to be brutal."

cooling down with water and was pretty sure I would be able to find the finish line, but I was glad to find this pool here."

"That was very, very nice." Top local finisher and Dallas native Sean Robbins knew the weather would play a major role in his performance right from the start.

"I was going to try and come out and race this course pretty hard, but I went out and warmed up before the swim and was drenched in about two minutes," Robbins said. "I knew it was going to be brutal. It's a tough course to begin with, even on a cool day, but on a day like today it just takes everything out of you."

"That's the way this course seems to go. Either it's cold and rainy or it's 100 degrees in the shade. This is probably some of the toughest conditions I've seen since I've been racing this course."

Prohaska agreed. "Other years we're wrapping them in blankets. This year we're trying to cool them down," he said.
