McNulty has had much to do with the funding development and coordination at the clinic.

The legal part of the clinic, operating since 1996, attends to broken relationships of other kinds. "We handle situations as broad as human nature," says Spohrer. Many are as simple as a neighbor with a barking dog or a domestic dispute, filling out insurance claim forms, or discussing estate matters. These are readily and easily handled when possible. Visiting the clinic can also be a way to get a second opinion.

Kevin Grebas, a new attorney specializing in elder law, there are many different issues. Some nights there are six or seven people to see in an hour and a half. I have personally drafted wills and helped people with estate planning."

Sometimes the support is less tangible.

One client - whose name Spohrer says, "As a lawyer, was withheld - had been injured falling in a parking lot.

in Kingston, steps out of his own law practice to volunteer at the clinic.

"It's refreshing, totally different from the work I do every day and when I meet my family for supper after 8 on the Friday night I volunteer, I say to them 'We did a lot of good for a lot of people there.' And, the people leave with the feeling that they have been helped and that's very gratifying for me."

As well staffed as the legal clinic presently is, the medical clinic finds itself short-handed.

Nurse practitioners Matiska and Betsy Gaffney and Bloom are the only medical volunteers qualified to write prescriptions, so they are on a rotating shift every third week and have been serving for 10 years. "It would be great to have a few more doctors to help. Any medically trained staff really would be appreciated," Matiska says.
