years," said Amy Gabriel. "Mike was a donor when he was a student in high school and in college. It's very important to their family."

"The Back Mountain really came out for this family during a time of tragedy. We're anticipating a great turnout."

we move forward we must keep in mind global diversity."

During his collegiate years at the University of Wisconsin-Madison, Shabazz played a key role in addressing racism and discrimination on campus after his digitally altered image was inserted into an admissions booklet to falsely portray diversity on campus.

He assisted in organizing rallies to expand services and resources for students of color.

In 2004, Shabazz was instrumental in developing and facilitating a "Rites of Passage" organization in Connecticut based on West African philosophies and methods. The organization "From Boys to Men" will serve as a life-skills training program for Black and Latino youth in that area.

"The dream is not just a dream for black people, but for all people," Shabazz said.

"We are redefining the dream for Asians, Latinos, Native Americans and White Americans. We have a long way to go individually and collectively. We must understand that we may be beaten but not broken. We must reclaim the dream."

and earned him a big round of applause.

"I thought the trick was neat," Shane Jacobsen, 11, of Dallas said.

Klusmeyer said the first trick he ever performed was finger chopping where he used a guillotine to chop through his fingers.

"I was doing all kinds of little tricks since I was about 10," he said. "My grandpa got me into it." Even though he didn't pull a rabbit out of his hat, he did wow the audience with many other tricks like magic pom poms and metal rings throughout his 45-minute performance.

Chris Roccogranti was plucked from the audience to assist Klusmeyer with his metal ring task.

"This is ring one, ring two, ring three and ring four, Klusmeyer said. "Can you remember that?" Roccogranti nodded and checked the rings for holes but said he couldn't find any.

"Incredible, amazing, solid steal through solid steal," Klusmeyer said as he magically crossed two rings together. "Now watch as they melt apart."

Madeline Mulhern, 11, of Dallas, said she thought the show was awesome and really creative.

"I think the $20 bill with the lime is my best trick," Klusmeyer said. "I won't tell how any of my tricks work. It's a secret."

Ignazio and Maria Anna Cavallaro
 Warmly Welcome You to Sicilia.

The Cavallaro's operated a pizzeria in Brooklyn, New York before coming to Tunkhannock. They wanted to be more than the typical pizzeria by choosing to open an authentic Italian Restaurant specializing in seafood and true Sicilian dishes. Of course, pizza, cold subs and hot heroes are always available. However, it is well worth the wait for their fine cuisine which is truly unique and flavorful.

The Cavallaro's believe as the Sicilians:
We wait on the food; The food does not wait on us.
