at the school.

J.P. Mascaro & Sons has entrusted $1,250,000 to RESPECT. Program presenter and education and communications coordinator Diana Iskolsky has a master's degree in elementary education and over five years of elementary school teaching experience. Iskolsky travels with Dumpo to elementary schools primarily in the southeastern section of the state. She was requested by local J.P. Mascaro & Sons officials to visit schools in the area.

"I learned the importance of respect from my parents and teachers when I was young," said company president Pat Mascaro. "Self-respect, respect of others and respect for the environment will carry young students a long way in their lives and I can't think of a better way for my company to participate in and to have a positive impact on something that really matters."

Madison Goodwin, a student at Dallas Elementary School, gets a hug and a prize from "Dumpo" the elephant at a third and fourth grade presentation on "Respect" given by the J.P. Mascaro waste disposal company.

Newspaper clippings and photographs were abundant at the reunion. They featured the women at a variety of events, including a sewing contest, fashion show, spring dance, rummage sale, giving out scholarships, as aides at the library auction, guides at the Sweetland Homestead and at a 24-year anniversary dinner at Prince of Peace Episcopal Church in 1968.

Georgia Besecker, now a resident of Florida, was president of the junior club from 1962 to 1963 and Rhuea Culp, currently of Kingston, was president from 1964 to 1965. The women sat and shared old stories of their days in the club. They remembered having minstrels, dances and making a big quilt for a fundraiser.

"I was a newcomer to the Back Mountain and I met a lot of friends," Culp said.

Besecker says the club was responsible for making and selling all of the candy at the former candy booth at the library auction.

"We made fudge in five pound batches and also we made lollipops," Besecker said. "And it was a job."

Jean Edwards of Huntsville says

she used to pop popcorn at the candy stand and attended many of the dances.

"You know it was after the war and everybody wanted to do something," Edwards said.

Haefele says since all of the women had a great time at the reunion, the group decided to hold another one in two years.
