New Treatment for Painful, Circulatory Conditions that Interfere with Sleep, Ability to Walk

Getting old doesn't have to mean you will be limited to a wheelchair or walker due to pain and balance problems. We have treated numerous patients who have responded to our innovative physical therapy program who had tried many traditional approaches to help with pain before trying our program.

11 Peer-reviewed studies involving over 4,000 patients have been published using this comprehensive therapy intervention which includes Anodyne Therapy - a new form of infrared photo energy that is cleared by the FDA to increase circulation and reduce pain.

How does it work?
Dr. Tom Burke, retired professor at the University of Colorado, explains the infrared light locally releases a molecule called nitric oxide. The Nobel Prize in 1998 was awarded for the discovery of the effects of nitric oxide on blood vessels.

"The effects of the Anodyne Therapy System occur because it rapidly increases circulation, thus reducing pain and helping to allow physical therapists to do what they do best - improve function and patients' ability to walk and perform their daily activities.

Healthcare professionals continue to document the exciting results of this therapy. Dr. Dale Carnegie, foot and ankle surgeon at Denver Health Medical Center reports, "I have used the Anodyne Therapy System since 1995 to treat several thousand patients with painful, circulatory problems in their feet and legs. We have seen improved pain and circulation within 12-24 treatments."

Neil Goldberg, MD, Endocrinologist and Associate Professor at UCLA states, "Anodyne Therapy has significantly improved my patients' level of pain. My patients' balance and gait has also improved with the comprehensive physical therapy program. This treatment has been a welcome adjunct to my therapeutic arsenal for patients and diabetes."

Perhaps the patients say it best. "I just want to thank you. My mother has suffered from painful circulatory problems in her legs and feet for years. Nothing we've tried has made a difference until now. Since she started Anodyne Therapy, she has been able to completely stop the medications she was taking and finally get some sleep at night."
